What Is the AntWorks Kit Used For?

An ant habitat turns animal behaviour into something a class can watch over days and weeks. Once ants are placed on the gel and the lid is secured, they start excavating; because the gel is translucent, students can follow each tunnel as it branches and deepens, note how the ants share work, and see how they carry excavated gel to the surface. It supports lessons on social insects, habitats, animal behaviour and the scientific method, with students keeping observation diaries and drawing the tunnel system as it develops.

To set up, use a thin probe to make a few small starting holes in the gel surface, add a small group of ants collected from one colony, and close the lid. Keep the habitat at room temperature, out of direct sunlight and away from heaters. Local rules on collecting and keeping insects should be followed, and ants should be released near where they were found at the end of the study.
