What Is the Sorting Tray Used For?

After a net sweep, the catch is tipped into a little water in a white tray, where dark-bodied animals such as snails, larvae and beetles stand out clearly against the pale base. Students then separate them by type using a spoon or pipette, count each group, and identify them with a key. At this 5 x 7 in size, each pair can have its own tray, which keeps sorting quick and reduces crowding at the pond edge.

The moulded pour spout lets students drain excess water or tip animals gently back into the pond, and the lift rim gives a secure grip when the tray is moved while full. Use only a shallow layer of water, keep trays in the shade so the water stays cool, and rinse them in clean water after each session. They are handy, low-cost pieces of school biology lab equipment for ecology practicals.

Supplier

Jain Scientific Equipments Private Limited, known by its trading name ScienceLab, supplies the sorting tray from Ambala, Haryana, India. Schools, colleges, outdoor-education centres and distributors can source it in class sets with other pond-dipping equipment, for delivery across India and to international markets.
