What Is a Woven Patient Gown Used For?

A patient gown keeps the patient covered while giving staff easy access for examinations, dressings, monitoring and procedures. The back ties let nurses dress patients who are lying down or have limited movement, and the short sleeves leave the arms clear for injections, drips and blood-pressure checks. Nursing and medical training centres also use such gowns when students practise ward care.

As a multiple-use item, the gown fits into a normal hospital laundry cycle: disinfect it in a chlorine solution, wash and iron, as the listing directs. White fabric shows stains clearly, and cloth that withstands boiling and autoclaving copes with the hot processes many health units apply to linen. Stock enough gowns per bed to cover the time each set spends in the laundry.
