What Is the Microslide Cells of Body Used For?

Cell specialisation is the idea this Microslide is built around. Students begin with the flat cheek cells they can collect from their own mouths, then see how blood, bone, muscle, nerve and gland cells are shaped for very different work. Placing voluntary and involuntary muscle on neighbouring images makes the link between structure and function easy to discuss.

Many teachers show it just before the cheek-cell practical, so students know what a stained human cell should look like before they prepare one. It also works as a revision station in human biology, sitting well alongside a human biology model set or a basic animal cell model.
