Second half	Shown in the normal position in the pelvis
Removable part	Rectum

Typical Use

In reproductive anatomy classes, the median section lets students see how the internal genital organs sit between the bladder in front and the rectum behind — a relationship that is hard to grasp from surface drawings. Taking out the removable rectum gives a clearer view of the neighbouring structures, and comparing the sectioned half with the half in its normal position helps learners connect a cut-away view with the body as it really is.

Nursing, midwifery and paramedical students use the model to relate pelvic anatomy to clinical topics such as catheterisation, pregnancy and childbirth. The numbered key card makes it easy to run quick identification tests, which is why it is useful school biology lab equipment for senior classes as well as professional training.
