Typical Use

Traces of chemicals, indicators and powders can stay on the skin even when gloves have been worn, so hand washing is the last step of every practical. Ask students to wet their hands, work the lather over the palms, the backs of the hands, between the fingers and around the nails, then rinse well under running water and dry on a clean towel. Teachers and lab assistants should follow the same routine after preparing reagents or cleaning glassware.

When planning a new lab setup for a school, place a hand-wash point with soap and towels close to the exit, and keep the first aid box for the lab within sight of it. A hand wash is meant for routine cleaning and is not a treatment for chemical splashes: if a corrosive chemical reaches the skin, rinse at once with plenty of running water and follow your first aid procedure, and use an eyewash for splashes to the eyes.
