Typical Use

Because it shows muscles and organs on one figure, this model lets a lesson move naturally from the outside of the body to the inside. Students can first identify the superficial muscles of the limbs and trunk, then remove individual muscles to see the deeper layer and the tendons and ligaments beneath. Taking off the chest plate, the front of the lungs and the abdominal organs then shows how the muscular wall protects the heart, liver, stomach, intestines, pancreas and spleen, while lifting the top of the skull reveals the 2-part brain.

Physical-education and sports-science teachers use the figure to link muscle groups with movements and common strains, and physiotherapy students use it to practise naming origins and actions. At half life size it is easy to carry between rooms and to share among small groups. Keep a list of the 30 parts with the model so everything is returned after each class, and store it where the rod mount will not be knocked.
